Most undergraduates will only experience a small sliver of Columbia's history during their time here; current students just lived through a year for the record books. As the University marked the fiftieth anniversary of the 1968 protests that redefined its identity, campus was roiled by a new series of student protests—those demanding expanded healthcare; crowds rallying against a series of incendiary white nationalist speakers; and, most recently, graduate students imploring the University to bargain with their union. In addition to our coverage of these developments in text and images, Spectator investigated inequities in offices ranging from academics to Columbia Athletics, documented the campus arts scenes' backlash to the policies of a rising Trump administration, and served as a platform for opinion pieces that challenged pre-existing notions about the undergraduate experience. Take a look back through the highs and lows of the 2017-2018 academic year and relive the most recent chapter in Columbia's history.
